Adobe continues to impress me. After purchasing a £200 refurbished iPad Air and downloading Photoshop CS2, I can't say enough good things about my decision. Not only did Apple make some incredible improvements to the iPad in the past 4 years, but Adobe has made a considerable leap forward too. The iPad Pro feels like the building block to a future away from the desktop. Photoshop on the iPad Pro feels like neither the desktop nor the iPhone, but a hybrid platform that produces believable results. It is not that easy to load and save presets from the Flash version of Photoshop CS6, because it does not recognize SessionActions plugins. So we replaced the presets by putting this assigned actions into our own custom actions. However, the assignments are not saved and must be re-assigned to any newly opened file. This makes the current live-action tutorial unpredictable, unless you re-open the file you want the steps to be performed on. When CC is installed, an empty folder named StepsLibrary (workspace by default) is automatically created at the root of your Adobe Photoshop installation. It is neither hidden nor protected. The CS6 Version of Photoshop now supports multiple image editing applications when using a Mac. To specifically mention the other allowed applications under the Mac CS6 Version tab is another improvement upon CS5. You can identify the names pretty easily

- my visual memory still works surprisingly well after years of technology use :- ) :- ) Best of all, working from one of the other applications is still much more efficient than needing to open Photoshop itself.
