The question is: "Do the benefits of the tools and the price outweigh the productivity costs?" For me, the answer is a resounding "No". When I am editing a series of images, I just don't have the time to invest in training myself. But, barring a U.S. law enforcement warrant, what's the harm there? It's not like Adobe is selling you this software. It's free and wrapped in a way that no one would take it amiss if you were to use it to connect to a network and download some books. Standard operating procedure is to disable networking at home, but it's possible to re-enable it should you want to. Even if you're doing that, it's no one's business beyond your block. Adobe claims they have a webshield that prevents online leaks since 2015. It's also possible to disable the Internet connection entirely and then take a nap, which is what I do with my Mac and Pixel XL. But don't let anyone tell you it's impossible to bypass. They just haven't figured out a way to do it yet. Even if you find a way to get around that, and turn off speech notifications - which I did - it's still not a great idea to be sneaking around with personal data, even if it's something innocuous like an illustration of a dragon. About that security, the app verifies that your download resolves with a score of at least 95 and then runs everything from there. My Internet speed has been inconsistent for decades, and the app never noticed it was almost 15 years old. Now, it's getting pretty good at automatically detecting when I'm on a community Wi-Fi network, but it doesn't know anything about a private network. My iPhone 7 still has the iPhone 4's AT&T connection. I think that's going to be the hardest part to get rid of, because my account is in Ohio and the account link goes away around the time I need it.
